Mr. M. D. Conway to Come to America. [Correspondence of the New York Tribune.] LONDON, February 13 .- You are to be richer and we are to be poorer next autumn by one good American. My friend Mr. Conway-the Rev. Moncure D. Conway he used to be called - is going to the United States for a visit and a lecturing tour. Really going this time. His friends at home have so often been promised a visit from him and so often been disappointed, that I wish to assure themthat my present announcement is mide on the best possible authority, that of Mr. Conway him-elf. "At last," writes he in his characteristic way, "I have yielded to the voice of the tempter. I go to America in the autumo for a turn at lecturing. I am told that I may arrange my journeyings so as to see my old friends also in many parts of the country. It has been so long said that I was can friend of his and mine, who has twice paid us a visit, wrote me not long since, " I cannot conceive of London without Conway. It would no lorger be London to me." But I suppose we ought to spare him to you for a time. He does not hint what South Place chapel is to do-whose voice is to be heard in the pulpit where his for so many years has gathered a faithful band about him, with many reinforcements of strangers who thronged to bear an American celebrity; nor do I see how the Cincinnuti Commercial is to supply the place of his letters-that quaint, fresh, original, racy correspondence which exposed to the Buckeye view so many sides of London life that nobody else ever saw, or could describe if he did. Mr. Conway's life here has been a very unusual one-very bonorable to bim in all v.ays. His is the rare case of an American coming without assured employment into the centre of English intellectual life, a centre crowded with ability, where mlents elbow one another; where the liferary work to be done bears but a fearfully small proportion to the number of men who want to do it, and succeeding. Mr. Conway mode bimself a reputation in England, all the while preserving and extending what he had previously gained in America. His acquain ance is wide and singularly various. He is going to lecture to you, among other topics, on London. When you have heard bim, London will ever after seem to you a new place. French wits said of Dumas, onthe appearance of one of his most famous books of travel, that he had discovered the Mediterranean. In a similar sense you will declare that Mr. Conway has discovered London. His views of England and English life are sure to be picturesque; his opinions will be his own, his judgment upon 6's, old, 26; new, 10; special tax, 3. Bid. our cousins, ingenious, during, possibly sometimes wayward, but always worth hearing. Whether you agree with him or not, you can't but love him and enjoy him. His other topics will be the Devil-whom he did not discover-and Oriental Religion. His studies for many years past have been much oc upied with both these su' jecis. His now well-known book, "The Sacred Anthology," showed how extensive his survey of the latter had been. Of that book the whole third edition has, by the enlightened liberality of a Scotch gentlemin, been sent out to India for the members of the Brahmo Somaj. I do not know what the Brahmo Some j may be, but the Scotch gentleman is not likely to low away his money on unworthy objects. A fourth edition will soon appear, with a new introduction.
